“ Nancy was loved immensely by her granddaughters. We tried our best to spoil her when we could. Every Christmas, we tried to find something fabulous for her to wear as a gift - usually something with leopard print or bright red. When she received something she loved, she'd always let out an enthusiastic OHHHH and hug it to her chest. We made it our mission to get this reaction from her as often as we could because it brought us pure joy and laughter. When we were young, grandma bought us an oversized Christmas song book and asked us to sing the songs to her together. I don't know if there was a moment when grandma was more happy than when we would sing to her, and, no surprise, she would go on to ask us to sing her Christmas songs every year after. It's hard to describe how funny grandma really was. Everyone who knew her young or old would agree. I think it was a combination of her always saying exactly what she was thinking and her lack of concern for [quote unquote] “proper” etiquette. From letting us play dress up in her clothes (and even wigs), to her gift of the gab, to her undying love of Tom Selleck, she taught us the freedom to be silly and joyful together and unafraid despite life's stresses, and I think that is her biggest gift to us and her greatest legacy. We love you grandma.
